Change is unpredictable, emergent and often discontinuous (big spikes, separated by periods of inertia). Feedback often dampens change and drags the system back to equilibrium. Not only that, but the system is constantly changing without our intervention, and our efforts to change it will be more like joining a football game than sitting down to fix a broken clock.

On the fence: Here, your teacher understands the need for change but isn't clear that she needs to change—or can change, for that matter. Ready to change: Ah, the sweet spot. At this point in the continuum, your teachers are fully aware of the problem and are ready to take action. It's from this place that real, lasting change can occur.

Switching the metaphor, the baby could be stillborn if we cannot midwife its birth. Change happens in the world and calls for change from us. We are inclined to talk of [emergence], and there is indeed a natural trajectory as life gets more complex. That natural trajectory is as true of ecologies as it is of socio-psychological reality.
